REVENUE FRAUDS—CONSTRUCTION OF THE EIGHTY PER CENT CLAUSE.

Some time ago a series of cases was commenced in the United States Circuit Court [illegible] tors and their sureties upon bonds given to secure the payment of taxes, upon warrants, and penalties. The proceedings were based upon the construction of the Internal Revenue law of [illegible] which provides that when the distiller shall not [illegible] cent of the producing capacity of his still, they are to be assessed at eighty per cent of the capacity of the still, and not upon the quantity actually produced, as a basis for taxation.

Counsel for the defendants [illegible] of the United States v. Jacob Singer and Joseph H. Bickerstaffe and others, having first upon the [illegible] of the Government to introduce testimony to [illegible] the [illegible] of the distillers, by some half a dozen gentlemen of this city, who had been [illegible] to the business, and who testified that [illegible] the single [illegible] to control [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] STALLO [illegible] for the defendants, [illegible] to their cases. The result of the argument is found in the following [illegible] decision of Judge [illegible], which decides substantially [illegible] and which will be of great importance to [illegible] as far as [illegible] it will be allowed to the [illegible] to conduct [illegible] business:

FRANCE.

Special Dispatch to The Chicago Tribune.
NEW YORK, May 13.—The Herald has the following special dispatch from Paris, May 12, via Key West:

The French people have given the Emperor a vote of confidence and of approval of his policy by a majority of about 1,500,000 votes, and of 4,000,000 of yes. But, though sustained, they are not satisfied with the manner in which the election in Paris was conducted, but, on the contrary, are filled with indignation and alarm at the gross frauds which have been perpetrated. The result was unexpected, but, on the other hand, equally unexpected and alarming was the majority for the plebiscitum in the Department of the Seine. The Government will hold itself responsible for the result in Paris, and the Emperor will not be free from blame if he does not punish the guilty. But the vote of the army is still more significant. The army of France, almost to a man, is for the Empire. Its devotion to the dynasty is unbounded. It is the army which has made the greatness of France, and it is the army which is about to attempt a political meeting. The entire army now in barracks, Concrete proposes to hold a meeting. Every man in the army will sign a vote of confidence in the Emperor, and a petition for the restoration of the Empire. Nevertheless, out of fewer than 300,000 votes there are 67,000 blanks, 30,000 spoiled votes, and 15,000 yeas. Some regiments give an unanimous vote of yeas. In the Seventy-second regiments at Vincennes, following Rochefort's advice, returned no vote. The commanders of these regiments insisted on watching the vote, through their own agents, and on having a vote at a general meeting. In the garrison of Paris, the dissatisfaction was so serious that General Bourbaki wanted Generals Trochu and Changarnier out of the city, but the Emperor refused on the ground that this would injure their popularity. Nevertheless, the severest measures will be taken with the army malcontents.

Some part of this huge system of terror and fraud will be exposed in the Corps Legislatif, and many of the votes which the opposition in the Corps Legislatif will demand. The Government will refuse any investigation, but it can not elude question. The first result of the election will be the reconstruction of the ministry. The Emperor's personal favorite is for strengthening rule; but if Ollivier will consent to retain his portfolio, he will probably be offered it. Rouher, however, is the real head of the ministry, and the Emperor will scarcely abandon him. Ollivier will not consent to serve if only a question of time. A portfolio will probably be offered to Daru, and also to the prefect of the Seine.

The disturbances in Paris since the vote have been absolutely insignificant. Every Republican journal has been suppressed, and no disturbances can occur were confined to remote quarters of the city, and were the result of the excitement of the presidential classes. As enormous military force was employed. The police and gendarmerie together, although barricades were building in the precincts of the Faubourg St. Antoine, were able to clear them until they were completed. Then they were attacked, but nobody could be found to fight. The barricades were quickly demolished into nothing in subsequent attacks, and the police made little in this absurd performance, but the soldiers had little to do beyond the second night.

The most significant result of the plot that has done harm enough, on of adding half a million, or a million, to the majority for the Empire, is the exposure of the late conspiracy, the ramifications of which are far more extensive than was supposed. Rochefort declares that the whole statement attributed to him is false. The Liberal journals express the indignation that has been inflicted in France by the palaverous. The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that the trials have begun over again. Says the Temps: "If France knows how what it is to be governed, it will not forgive the Empire." declares the Rappel, "Mr. Ollivier has a hateful among the Empire." It has got nothing but its name left. It has not even a majority in the country. It has got only a majority in the army, and that is because it has been corrupted by the two daughters of Bonaparte, regent in 1848 and 1851, and by the Empress Eugenie, who has not scrupled to accomplish their purpose. Rochefort arrived after a time, but fearing that he would be killed, he would be killed, he would be killed,
